You will find this interesting - even enlightening - and may wish to distribute further.

1 to 2 and 3 -

[redacted] has used an interesting technique to elicit responses from Midcareerists in a support sense. The answers received are obviously subjective; i.e., a given individual's opinion. Depending on how one answers the first question there may be no correlation to answering the second and third. I also feel that the question concerning the "most important intelligence aspect of this problem" might elicit a different response if the question were related to the Agency per se as opposed to "intelligence aspect". Perhaps it would be interesting if different approaches to this technique were tried in several Midcareer, Senior Seminar, Advanced Intelligence Seminar Courses. Perhaps the questions could be given the first day of the course and again the last day and see what the correlation is. Like in all such endeavors, the questions would have to be particularly tailored to elicit specifically that which is desired.
